This book, like the great spires it discusses, has been constructed over many years, and in many different campaigns. In looking back over the history of this project, it is both pleasant and humbling to realize how many people have helped me with it along the way.

My interest in Gothic architecture was first triggered nearly twenty-three years ago when my parents took me, as a twelve-year-old child, to visit Reims cathedral. I am profoundly grateful to them for their loving support of my new obsession, which helped me to build a strong foundation for my subsequent more scholarly work.

I feel very fortunate to have studied with a series of talented and encouraging mentors: the late Stephen Gardner, my first teacher in the field; Sergio Sanabria, who inspired me with his excesses of both rigor and humor; Virginia Jansen, who helped me understand the culture of art history; and my doctoral advisors, Robert Mark and Stephen Murray, who taught me a tremendous amount about the structural and social forces at work in Gothic architecture, while simultaneously giving me the freedom to pursue my own lines of inquiry as I researched and wrote my dissertation on great spires.

It gives me real pleasure to acknowledge the kindness and consideration of many colleagues and friends who have enriched my life and scholarship by welcoming me into the German world. Arnold Wolff and Marc Steinmann helped to launch my research in the Cologne Cathedral archives, and the Graf-Bicher family were wonderful hosts on my first major research trip in the region, which was generously supported by a DAAD grant. More recently, I have shared many pleasant research and travel experiences with Achim Timmermann, Pablo de la Riestra, and Hans and Regina Böker.

Norbert Nussbaum deserves very special thanks for generously supporting my research initiatives and helping their fruits to see the light of day. By inviting me to speak at the International Parler Colloquium in 2001, and by inviting me to publish this book in the Gelbe Reihe, he has contributed dramatically to my professional development. I am enormously grateful to him, and I am pleased to thank the Nussbaum and Siegert families for welcoming me and my spire mania into their world.

Closer to home, I have received a great deal of aid and encouragement from the University of Iowa. This project would not have been possible without the generous financial, moral, and logistical support of the International Programs Office, the Arts and Humanities Initiative, and my colleagues in the School of Art and Art History. I am particularly pleased to thank my three student assistants, Danya Crites, Jeff Miller, and Steve Addy, who deserve tremendous credit for their hard work illustrating and formatting the present volume.

Finally, I am happy to humbly acknowledge the loving support of my wife, Sally Mills, whose partnership over the past decade has done much to make my life rich, fulfilling, and well punctuated, in more ways than one. For years, this book project has turned our home into a spire construction worksite, but it was Sally's help that allowed me to add the final pinnacles. This project is now complete, but the delightful project of building our life together goes on.
